Customer Reviews

This is a thoroughly thought provoking book. Throughout history mankind has built, used, maybe abused, and then abandoned. We see this in crumbling castles and forts all around the world. But there are many, many more recent cases of abandonment that we have forgotten about in our rush to the future, and it is these places that Kieron Connolly has chosen to concentrate on and illustrate with superb photographs. There is, for instance, the now almost totally dried up Astral Sea, where ships lie in a man-made desert, a victim of Soviet tinkering with nature of the last century. And more recently the empty playgrounds and streets of Fukushima, Japan, the result of the meltdown of the nuclear power station there. Closer to home is Bodi, California, left behind by the world when the last gold mine there was closed in 1942 leaving the little town to be recolonised by the wild, and the still beautiful City Hall Station in New York City, though closed to passengers since 1945. If you care about your world and recognise the line 'something lost and something' gained, or if you are simply curious about the forgotten relics of recent history, give Abandoned Places a look - or maybe buy it for a like-minded friend.
